Very few of Tennyson's books have been bought with such an eager rush as his late work. The leading book shops in the City and West End were quite a sight on the morning of its appearance, and the large shop, patronised mainly by the lawyers of Lincoln's Inn and the Temple, was almost of a character to astonish the oldest habitué, and it is with no surprise that we learn that the first edition is already exhausted. In the omission of the interesting poem the last time of the volume of poems entitled "The Holy Grail," which is dated 1870, but which appeared in 1867, 40,000 copies were ordered in advance.

It is understood, says a London correspondent, that the members of the Cabinet are now in possession of Mr Gladstone's leading proposals for the Home Rule Bill, and that it will next be thrashed out in greater detail by the committee of the Cabinet to which it has been referred, and which minister will might be better named the "Home Rule Group." To the complete formulation of his Home Rule project, Mr Gladstone has devoted the other three or four members of the group, will during the next month or two devote almost his sole attention, leaving other matters of Cabinet business to be dealt with by other members of the group, who will be in charge of bills not session practically to their own devices. For instance, Mr Fowler, as before mentioned, is already engaged upon the Registration Bill, and, as a matter of fact, has decided upon its main provisions. Of course, all possible facilities will be given to the Government of the Cabinet at large, and Mr Gladstone will exercise a general directing hand on all pending matters; but it is understood that Home Rule will absorb a monopoly of his attention and energies, just as it is bound to do when the legislative programme of the Government is submitted to Parliament.

Local News.

The "Athletic Notes" will appear to-morrow.

THE JOINERS' DISPUTE AT JARROW.—After a protracted interview yesterday forenoon between Mr Price and Mr Dingdale as the chief of Palmers company, and Mr Patterson and three members of a deputation from the joiners, at which the various questions pertaining to the starting of work after meal hours were thoroughly discussed, an amicable arrangement was come to, by which the whole of the men returned to work to-day.

THE PRELIMINARY PHARMACEUTICAL EXAMINATION.—At this examination, held on the 11th ult., before T. Jackson, one of Mr J. Jackson, Northumberland Terrace, Tynemouth, was awarded the successful candidates. He was prepared for the examination by Mr Jackson, who has been assistant to Mr Hodgkin, Leith and Arithmetic, by Mr T. F. Mason, Higher Grade School, Albion Road, North Shields.

WEST OF ENGLAND HOUSE.

ASSISTANTS' FOURTH ANNUAL DINNER.—The employees of Messrs D. Hill and Company (West of England House) held their fourth annual dinner at the Grand Hotel, Tynemouth, last night. Mr F. Chapman presided, and Mr L. Brown acted as vice-chairman. Among those present were Messrs Collinson, Pike, Howard, Turner, and Lewis, Sunderland; Bolton, Lawson, and Hesson, Newcastle; Atkinson, and Bisson, Bradford; Ballantyne and Leach, Edinburgh; Hyslop, Dundee; Hutchinson, served in excellent style by the new manager of the "Grand" (Mr Downey), and appeared to be heartily enjoyed by the entire company.

After the removal of the cloth, the Chairman gave "The Queen and England, Prosperity to Commerce," honored in the customary way. The Vice-Chairman gave "The Army, Navy, and Reserve Forces," to which Mr Collinson, of Manchester, responded.

Mr R Callander next proposed the toast of the evening, "Success to D. Hill and Co." In the course of a jocular speech he said he felt greatly honoured on having to propose the toast of such an old and important firm as D. Hill and Co. He had been in their employ long ago, for a life time, filled an important position in the trade of England, distinguished for their energy, enterprise, and integrity. (Applause.) In the days of fierce competition, it took more than ordinary capacity to keep pace with the times. He felt sure they would all agree with him when he said the success of D. Hill and Co. possessed that commercial wisdom which insures success. (Applause.) Having been in their employ for the last 12 years, he could speak to the good feeling existing between the firm and their assistants. There was that esprit de corps in the house that was too seldom found in business. The assistants of the firm took a great interest in their assistants. One of the best proofs of that interest was the fact that the last 18 months they had closed their establishment every Wednesday—a new idea. (Applause.) He thought it was a popular movement in the town; still it was not quite unanimous, and it was there was the feeling existed between D. Hill and Co. for the action they took on that occasion, particularly when it was remembered the very large and very doubtful attitude of some of their neighbours on that occasion. (Laughter and applause.) Wednesday half-holiday was a great success in spite of that, and he hoped the firm would be as popular with the public. What the public did the firm collectively be called upon to do, viz., to pay their quota. The principal of the firm (Mr Hill) was a gentleman of whom they were all proud. (Applause.) Mr Chapman was conversant with the many virtues of "the old governor" as they were fond of calling him, but was quite sure that his son had inherited all his father's good qualities, and had put them into practice. (Applause.) He was very happy in the position so willing to do a kind and generous act, and so reluctant to perform a disagreeable duty. That was the highest compliment. He spoke from his own personal experience. The same evening he said he was one of the members of the firm. (Applause.) They had only to know Mr Chapman for a short time to have a high opinion of his kindly disposition. (Applause.) Mr Lidkie, he knew best, knew the good he possessed. He thought he knew him than the rest, and he could answer them that each year only added more and more to the respect and esteem in which he held him for his great business qualities, his manly character, and his generous nature. It had very great pleasure in proposing success to the firm of D. Hill and Co. (Applause.)

The toast was drunk with musical honours and hearty cheers.

Mr Forster, responding to the toast, expressed at the outset his appreciation of the honour they had conferred upon him by so enthusiastically drinking to that toast. During his connection with the concern he had always been a kind of friendship to the employees and the firm, and the utmost good feeling had always prevailed between the firm and their assistants. They would agree with him in saying that the firm had always acted carefully in the interests of their assistants, and had always acted straightforwardly and honourably towards them. (Applause.) It was the ambition of every individual member of the firm that they should spend their leisure to the fullest extent on that auspicious occasion, and he did not doubt but that those present would go away with the evening and with the strains of sweet music and the perfume of autumn blossoms. (Applause.) The toast was that had the pleasure of meeting the employees of the West of England House in a social way was a very pleasant one. He had visited the football arena and threw down the gauntlet to the firm, and he was glad that the Company who were performing at the local theatre a week ago. (Laughter.) The assistants had shown great equal to the occasion, and gave an excellent exposition of the Amazonian Dance (Hilarious laughter.) Their thinking was marvellous. (Loud laughter.) The contest was promoted for the benefit of Tynemouth Infirmary, and they were able to hand over a nice little sum to the hospital. (Applause.) Mr Forster, continuing, he trusted that the harmony and good feeling which at present existed between the employees and the firm would long continue, and that he would offer be privileged in years to come to again meet them at this social gathering. He drew attention to a cup of cine. (Applause.)

Mr Chapman said that Mr Hill had been associated with the firm as an employee for something like forty-two years, and he could bear testimony to the truth of the assertions made by the proposer of the toast concerning the good feeling existing between the employees of the firm and their assistants. He might tell them that his services to the company were beginning to ebb. His retirement was in the near future, so that perhaps he would never again be at such a gathering of employees, but assured their employees he could assure them, however, that his retirement would be in no sense of attachment to such social gatherings. (Applause.) Mr Forrest had spoken of the section of the company to promote the social match for the benefit of the Infirmary. He would like to supplement his remarks by stating that there was a body of men in the drapery and furnishing line, the assistants of D. Hill and Co., who had shown a disposition to assist all alike in relation to pecuniary support given to that useful institution. He (Mr Chapman) was substantially supported by the story, which was substantially supported by the story, which was always ready and willing to give what support they could to relieve distress, and whenever anything was required for charitable purposes they very often contributed to the fund. (Applause.) He trusted that the assistants of the West of England House would long continue to take part in such laudable work. (Hearty applause.)

Mr W. H. Thomson gave "The Visitors," to which Mr Stevenson, of Bradford, responded in a speech, in the course of which he expressed regret that Mr Liddle had been prevented from attending that evening, owing to a family bereavement, and trusted that the cloud which at present hung over his house would be dispelled by the healer, Time.

Mr A. Mitchell gave "The Press," to which the representative of the Shields Daily News responded.

Other toasts followed, including "The Host," "The Chairman," "The Chairman and Vice-Chairman," and "Mr Teesdale." The latter gentleman had enhanced the pleasure of the evening by his rendering of some bunches of variegated chrysanthemums and other autumn flowers, which diffused a pleasant perfume about the room.

During the evening songs, recitations, violin solos, and music were given by Mr A. Wilkinson, Mr Thompson, Mr Benson, Mr J. Tally, Mr A. Johnson, Mr Ogle, Mr Rowe, Master Wilkinson, Master Mr W. Dury, Mr J. T. Atchinson, Mr Forrest, and others. Mr Wilkinson's selections were the pieces de resistance of the entertainment. His rendition of "Man the Lifeboat," "The Ship on the Raging Billows," and other songs elicited the heartiest applause. Mr George Thompson's violin solos were also accordingly well received. The other performers acquitted themselves commendably. The proceedings were brought to a close with "Auld Lang Syne."

A word of praise is due to the committee—Messrs Ogle, Rowe, and Smith—for the excellence of the arrangements.

THE APPALLING RAILWAY CATASTROPHE NEAR THIRSK.

THE "FLYING SCOTSMAN" IN FLAMES.

SEVERAL BODIES CREMATED.

HEARTRENDING SCENES.

STATEMENTS BY EYE-WITNESSES.

Further details of the railway collision near Thirsk (which catastrophe was duly reported by us yesterday) show that it was the most terrible that has ever occurred on the North-Eastern Railway system. The Flying Scotsman, which was timed to leave Edinburgh at 10 20 p.m., was divided into two trains in consequence of the glut of passenger traffic at the Waverley Station, which left Aberdeen and Edinburgh at a few minutes past eleven on Tuesday night, and went well together. The train was passed soon after three o'clock yesterday morning, but when near the village of Thirsk, the second section, which was express travelling at nearly fifty miles an hour, the ill-fated train dashed into a heavily-laden mineral train which was being shunted on the down line, standing on the main up line to the South. The result was appalling. The express was composed of about twelve carriages, including the Pullman car and a goods van, and all these were smashed by the force of the collision, whilst the locomotive of the mineral train was completely upside down and thrown partially into a field belonging to Manor House Farm, opposite which the catastrophe took place. The scene that ensued was indescribable. Most of the passengers as were unhurt got out of the carriages as best they could, and devoted themselves with heroic energy to the task of rescuing their less fortunate fellow-passengers. Fire, however, prevailed at the time, and as all the lights had been extinguished by the force of the collision there was very little to be done. But the fire had to be quenched before any help could be rendered to the injured, and this was effected by the Railway Hotel, Thirsk, were booked through from Dumbarton and Glasgow to Australia; and the little girl, Miss Lottie Hamilton, was in their charge. The last-named had been ill for some time past, and she was with a view to her physical benefit that her parents had sent her to Australia. The mother, Miss Hamilton was heard screaming piteously beneath a piece of the engine. She was removed as speedily and as carefully as possible but when released was found to be in a terrible state from crushing and burning. The doctors had her sent on to Thirsk, where better treatment was to be obtained. Death, however, intervened before she reached Thirsk, and now her body rests with those of seven other passengers in a room at Thirsk Station, awaiting the formal opening of the inquest, which is to take place at three o'clock this afternoon. Mr Buchanan, the Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, had left Helmingham Tuesday night to reach Cambridge on Wednesday morning. He has sustained very serious injuries, and is now at the Lambert Memorial Hospital, Thirsk. The guard and the driver of the express, Mr Ewart of Gateshead, is also under treatment for a crushed right leg, and he is said to be in a little the worse for cuts from broken glass and severe bruises on the body. These two men are thought to consider precaution, Mr Buchanan in particular being in a critical condition. It is fully expected that Mr McCulloch will recover. Some of the passengers proceeded to York, others to their destinations, and others went on to Thirsk to be witnesses of the accident, namely, Mr Buchanan, Mr McCulloch, Mr Ewart, and Mr Mackenzie, who had removed to a cottage near to the Manor House Farm.

The fireman of the express, whose name was not to be obtained at Thirsk, like the engine-driver, was thrown from his position on the field on the Manor House Farm. When picked up, suffering from bruises and shock to the system, he was taken to the Northallerton Cottage Hospital. The guards of the train were unhurt. The express left Leeds for York, and the other went on to London as usual. The engine of the express, which was in the front of the express at the time of the accident, having taken his place in the middle van, the other official was at the rear of the train.

A DREAM THAT PRECEDED DEATH

A strange tree story is that of Mr Mackenzie, a passenger by the express. Mr Mackenzie, who was in company with his wife, travelling to London, where he proposed commencing work as a tailor. Mr Mackenzie states that he was asleep, leaving Darlington his wife handed over to her husband, and he, Mr Mackenzie, to take care of. He then went to sleep and fell asleep—he dreamed—he was in a railway train, no doubt, take note of the incident—and he dreamt that something unpleasant was going to happen, and he was awakened by the shock, after which he was in a dreadful state, and was assisted by the door of the compartment gave way, and he found himself in the middle of the wreck, and he travelled had been thrown forward beside the engine, and he found when he dropped from the carriage that water from the tank of the engine was streaming all over him. Fancying that the tank had been thrown over a bridge, he came to the conclusion that, as though to save his life by flying, he ran for the ground, and called out scrambling out he was almost overcome with the sight of the wounded, the plaintive cries of women and children, the groans of the men, and the awful nature of the scene which then presented itself. He was pulled unconscious by the securing possession of a lantern, went to look for his wife, and he was then, he said, he called her name. She, alas! was dead, having received, and instantly, the injuries of death. When he found Mrs Mackenzie she was in an opposing attitude, with her arms stretched forward, and her head thrown back, after which he himself gave way to his keen emotion and the sorrow of the position. He fainted and was taken from the scene to a neighbouring house in an unconscious condition. It is understood that Mr Mackenzie had in his hand-bag a sum of money, about £18, and this was swiped up in the heat of the burning carriage.

PERSONAL NARRATIVES.

Among the passengers by the ill-fated train was Mr R. A. Hodgson, of 37 Upper George Street, Bryanston Square, London, W., who after the collision proceeded to York, where he arrived at Station Hotel. He is suffering from an injury to the back, and should be unable to do any work for an interview with a representative of the press, he said:—I had been to Glasgow on Monday on business, and was returning to town by the Scotch express from Aberdeen. I joined the train there at ten minutes to eleven, and I intended to go on to Edinburgh just before eleven o'clock, and reached Newcastle about some time before two in the morning. Everything seemed to be all right until Darlington, and we passed a long path, and I left the carriage "caving in" feet fashion. I instantly realised that we had collided with something, and I ran out of the compartment in which I was, "Sir, Go's sake, put your legs on the seat." We were thrown about a little in the compartment. The doors of the carriage being locked, I crawled through a window, and lifted out one of the ladies. I then assisted to lift out some of the passengers, and, accompanied by one, I climbed and placed them at the side of the line. I gave what assistance I could to the dead and the injured. I shall never forget the scene. It was a most shocking spectacle, and to add to the horror of the situation the cries of those who were the passengers who were not seriously injured "lost their heads." I assisted to extricate the passengers by after their dear ones. I took upon myself the responsibility of getting out the injured from the van near the engine, and though I don't wish to put myself forward, I may say that I did my duty. I was at it had not been for my exertions the greater part of the luggage would have been lost. Several of the passengers were in a state of fright, and I got out, which we completed before the breakdown gang came. I remember especially a young lady in Leeds mails and other mails which were being conveyed to the scene. I remember the passengers I slipped down and "ricked" my back. I was the middle of the train, and I had narrow escape. I could see that were killed and injured than there were. I consider I and others had a marvellous escape. Let me mention that there were little bruises, but no serious injuries. The engine-driver of the express, I could see, had been very badly injured, and was covered with blood and dirt, and was taken away to watch the flames and prevent the fire to the site of the line, and he said, "Never mind me, go and look after the poor passengers." I was in a brave thing to say, but he afterwards dragged him on a cushion to a safer place. The guard was injured, and I understand he had to give the signal to block the line in either direction. The sight was quite shocking again. I saw a woman who had been thrown by the collision under the wreck, and I extricated her from it, and I helped the husband out. He was injured, and came to us crying, "My poor wife is under there." It was impossible for us to do, as the flames and the fire were blazing furiously. I never want to go through such an experience again, and there I was from seven o'clock in the morning, after I had done all I could have lifted from each other and groaning again by some Thirsk group. Further down the line, on the little siding for farm stock, there was more wreckage, and in time, when daylight had permitted, I found that the engine with its tender, the luggage was disembedded, and was placed along the side of the line, where it was curious to note that there was some of the roof pieces from carriages, showing the glide of the gas illuminant inside. A most striking feature of the whole affair is that with all the appliances for the prevention of the collision sound of the lighter articles were quite uninjured. The Pullman car, manufactured by the Palace Car Company, contained material which did not appear at all strong as compared with the other carriages, had its compartments and drapery in it, it said, the worse moved, and the roof cut up into overhanging shreds. Yet with an intervention of providence, for it seemed had been nothing else, not one of its occupants escaped without serious injuries. The description of this car in some slight degree accounted for this, as the portion which suffered the most and the end nearest the engine, was devoted to the purpose of lavatory, thus affording a space before reaching the car proper, in which sits several passengers of position. A section of the train which was removed to Northallerton in the morning, and was, we believe, the only part recovered intact, consisted of two carriages. There was, too, a composite carriage taken back to Northallerton. The front end of the latter was burnt out, and the entire roof was charred, the windows clay being broken.

THE KILLED AND INJURED.

TWO LADIES BURNED TO DEATH

During the morning the bodies of the seven passengers were identified at Thirsk. The mineral train guard was recognised as a Middlesbrough man, and in the afternoon it was stated that the inconsiderable mortal remains of the two lady passengers had also been identified. As to the accuracy of the rumour that a mother and her children had been killed and their bodies consumed in the burning debris, it was found impossible to write definitely last night. It is hoped that the story is without foundation, though it is admitted that its truth is quite possible. Appended is a list of the killed and injured:—

KILLED.

Mr R M Boyle, traveller for Messrs Angenar and Co., Mr Angenar Street, London.

Mr H. P. Brodie, Plyn Villa, Walwood Road, Leytonstone, London.

Mr John H. Gray, potato merchant, 111 Commercial Street, Spitalfields Market, London.

Mr Jas. J. Anderson, 9 Fountainhall Street, Dundee.

Mr J. Roswell Hill, 116 George Street, Edinburgh.

Captain Donald McLeod, of the 42nd Highlanders (Black Watch).

Grand Pottle, Middlesbrough.

Miss Lottie Hamilton, aged 5, 2 Gilmore Street, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire.

Mrs Mackenzie, Seven Dwellings, Edinburgh.

Miss McCulloch, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire.

INJURED.

Driver Rowland Ewart, York Street, Gateshead; fractured thigh and shock to system.

Mr James Buchanan, Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge; severe injuries to head and face.

Lady Stewart, 73 Harrington Gardens, London.

Mr Thomas Mackenzie, Leeds, Leeds.

Mr David Reid Pottie, Edinburgh.

Mr David McCulloch, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire; slightly injured.

Provost Sutherland, of Eddinburgh.

Miss McCulloch, Alexandria.

Miss McCulloch, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire.

Driver Rowland Ewart, York Street, Gateshead; fractured thigh and shock to system.

Mr James Buchanan, Edinburgh.

Mr Alexander Mackenzie, Leven Street, Dundee.

Mr David Reid Pottie, Edinburgh.

Mrs Mackenzie was travelling with her husband to London, where he proposed starting work as a tailor. Mrs McLeod, of the Black Watch, who it is stated, intended travelling to India to rejoin his regiment, Miss McCulloch and her brother, who is injured, and is now detained at the Railway Hotel, Thirsk, were booked through from Dumbarton and Glasgow to Australia; and the little girl, Miss Lottie Hamilton, was in their charge. The last-named had been ill for some time past, and she was with a view to her physical benefit that her parents had sent her to Australia. The mother, Miss Hamilton was heard screaming piteously beneath a piece of the engine. She was removed as speedily and as carefully as possible but when released was found to be in a terrible state from crushing and burning. The doctors had her sent on to Thirsk, where better treatment was to be obtained. Death, however, intervened before she reached Thirsk, and now her body rests with those of seven other passengers in a room at Thirsk Station, awaiting the formal opening of the inquest, which is to take place at three o'clock this afternoon. Mr Buchanan, the Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, had left Helmingham Tuesday night to reach Cambridge on Wednesday morning. He has sustained very serious injuries, and is now at the Lambert Memorial Hospital, Thirsk. The guard and the driver of the express, Mr Ewart of Gateshead, is also under treatment for a crushed right leg, and he is said to be in a little the worse for cuts from broken glass and severe bruises on the body. These two men are thought to consider precaution, Mr Buchanan in particular being in a critical condition. It is fully expected that Mr McCulloch will recover. Some of the passengers proceeded to York, others to their destinations, and others went on to Thirsk to be witnesses of the accident, namely, Mr Buchanan, Mr McCulloch, Mr Ewart, and Mr Mackenzie, who had removed to a cottage near to the Manor House Farm.

The fireman of the express, whose name was not to be obtained at Thirsk, like the engine-driver, was thrown from his position on the field on the Manor House Farm. When picked up, suffering from bruises and shock to the system, he was taken to the Northallerton Cottage Hospital. The guards of the train were unhurt. The express left Leeds for York, and the other went on to London as usual. The engine of the express, which was in the front of the express at the time of the accident, having taken his place in the middle van, the other official was at the rear of the train.

A DREAM THAT PRECEDED DEATH

A strange tree story is that of Mr Mackenzie, a passenger by the express. Mr Mackenzie, who was in company with his wife, travelling to London, where he proposed commencing work as a tailor. Mr Mackenzie states that he was asleep, leaving Darlington his wife handed over to her husband, and he, Mr Mackenzie, to take care of. He then went to sleep and fell asleep—he dreamed—he was in a railway train, no doubt, take note of the incident—and he dreamt that something unpleasant was going to happen, and he was awakened by the shock, after which he was in a dreadful state, and was assisted by the door of the compartment gave way, and he found himself in the middle of the wreck, and he travelled had been thrown forward beside the engine, and he found when he dropped from the carriage that water from the tank of the engine was streaming all over him. Fancying that the tank had been thrown over a bridge, he came to the conclusion that, as though to save his life by flying, he ran for the ground, and called out scrambling out he was almost overcome with the sight of the wounded, the plaintive cries of women and children, the groans of the men, and the awful nature of the scene which then presented itself. He was pulled unconscious by the securing possession of a lantern, went to look for his wife, and he was then, he said, he called her name. She, alas! was dead, having received, and instantly, the injuries of death. When he found Mrs Mackenzie she was in an opposing attitude, with her arms stretched forward, and her head thrown back, after which he himself gave way to his keen emotion and the sorrow of the position. He fainted and was taken from the scene to a neighbouring house in an unconscious condition. It is understood that Mr Mackenzie had in his hand-bag a sum of money, about £18, and this was swiped up in the heat of the burning carriage.

PERSONAL NARRATIVES.

Among the passengers by the ill-fated train was Mr R. A. Hodgson, of 37 Upper George Street, Bryanston Square, London, W., who after the collision proceeded to York, where he arrived at Station Hotel. He is suffering from an injury to the back, and should be unable to do any work for an interview with a representative of the press, he said:—I had been to Glasgow on Monday on business, and was returning to town by the Scotch express from Aberdeen. I joined the train there at ten minutes to eleven, and I intended to go on to Edinburgh just before eleven o'clock, and reached Newcastle about some time before two in the morning. Everything seemed to be all right until Darlington, and we passed a long path, and I left the carriage "caving in" feet fashion. I instantly realised that we had collided with something, and I ran out of the compartment in which I was, "Sir, For God's sake, put your legs on the seat." We were thrown about a little in the compartment. The doors of the carriage being locked, I crawled through a window, and lifted out one of the ladies. I then assisted to lift out some of the passengers, and, accompanied by one, I climbed and placed them at the side of the line. I gave what assistance I could to the dead and the injured. I shall never forget the scene. It was a most shocking spectacle, and to add to the horror of the situation the cries of those who were the passengers who were not seriously injured "lost their heads." I assisted to extricate the passengers by after their dear ones. I took upon myself the responsibility of getting out the injured from the van near the engine, and though I don't wish to put myself forward, I may say that I did my duty. I was at it had not been for my exertions the greater part of the luggage would have been lost. Several of the passengers were in a state of fright, and I got out, which we completed before the breakdown gang came. I remember especially a young lady in Leeds mails and other mails which were being conveyed to the scene. I remember the passengers I slipped down and "ricked" my back. I was the middle of the train, and I had narrow escape. I could see that were killed and injured than there were. I consider I and others had a marvellous escape. Let me mention that there were little bruises, but no serious injuries. The engine-driver of the express, I could see, had been very badly injured, and was covered with blood and dirt, and was taken away to watch the flames and prevent the fire to the site of the line, and he said, "Never mind me, go and look after the poor passengers." I was in a brave thing to say, but he afterwards dragged him on a cushion to a safer place. The guard was injured, and I understand he had to give the signal to block the line in either direction. The sight was quite shocking again. I saw a woman who had been thrown by the collision under the wreck, and I extricated her from it, and I helped the husband out. He was injured, and came to us crying, "My poor wife is under there." It was impossible for us to do, as the flames and the fire were blazing furiously. I never want to go through such an experience again, and there I was from seven o'clock in the morning, after I had done all I could have lifted from each other and groaning again by some Thirsk group. Further down the line, on the little siding for farm stock, there was more wreckage, and in time, when daylight had permitted, I found that the engine with its tender, the luggage was disembedded, and was placed along the side of the line, where it was curious to note that there was some of the roof pieces from carriages, showing the glide of the gas illuminant inside. A most striking feature of the whole affair is that with all the appliances for the prevention of the collision sound of the lighter articles were quite uninjured. The Pullman car, manufactured by the Palace Car Company, contained material which did not appear at all strong as compared with the other carriages, had its compartments and drapery in it, it said, the worse moved, and the roof cut up into overhanging shreds. Yet with an intervention of providence, for it seemed had been nothing else, not one of its occupants escaped without serious injuries. The description of this car in some slight degree accounted for this, as the portion which suffered the most and the end nearest the engine, was devoted to the purpose of lavatory, thus affording a space before reaching the car proper, in which sits several passengers of position. A section of the train which was removed to Northallerton in the morning, and was, we believe, the only part recovered intact, consisted of two carriages. There was, too, a composite carriage taken back to Northallerton. The front end of the latter was burnt out, and the entire roof was charred, the windows clay being broken.

INTERVIEW WITH THE MARQUIS OF TWEEDDALE.

Among those who came on to London was the Marquis of Tweeddale, who stated, in the course of an interview with a representative of the Press Association:—"At the time of the accident the express in which I was a passenger was travelling at the rate of nearly 50 miles an hour. The guards train had been shunted. As to the accuracy of the rumour that a mother and her children had been killed and their bodies consumed in the burning debris, it was found impossible to write definitely last night. It is hoped that the story is without foundation, though it is admitted that its truth is quite possible. Appended is a list of the killed and injured:—

KILLED.

Mr R M Boyle, traveller for Messrs Angenar and Co., Mr Angenar Street, London.

Mr H. P. Brodie, Plyn Villa, Walwood Road, Leytonstone, London.

Mr John H. Gray, potato merchant, 111 Commercial Street, Spitalfields Market, London.

Mr Jas. J. Anderson, 9 Fountainhall Street, Dundee.

Mr J. Roswell Hill, 116 George Street, Edinburgh.

Captain Donald McLeod, of the 42nd Highlanders (Black Watch).

Grand Pottle, Middlesbrough.

Miss Lottie Hamilton, aged 5, 2 Gilmore Street, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire.

Mrs Mackenzie, Seven Dwellings, Edinburgh.

Miss McCulloch, Alexandria, Dumbartonshire.

INJURED.

Driver Rowland Ewart, York Street, Gateshead; fractured thigh and shock to system.

Mr James Buchanan, Edinburgh.

Mr Alexander Mackenzie, Leven Street, Dundee.

Mr David Reid Pottie, Edinburgh.

Mrs Mackenzie was travelling with her husband to London, where he proposed starting work as a tailor. Mrs McLeod, of the Black Watch, who it is stated, intended travelling to India to rejoin his regiment, Miss McCulloch and her brother, who is injured, and is now detained at the Railway Hotel, Thirsk, were booked through from Dumbarton and Glasgow to Australia; and the little girl, Miss Lottie Hamilton, was in their charge. The last-named had been ill for some time past, and she was with a view to her physical benefit that her parents had sent her to Australia. The mother, Miss Hamilton was heard screaming piteously beneath a piece of the engine. She was removed as speedily and as carefully as possible but when released was found to be in a terrible state from crushing and burning. The doctors had her sent on to Thirsk, where better treatment was to be obtained. Death, however, intervened before she reached Thirsk, and now her body rests with those of seven other passengers in a room at Thirsk Station, awaiting the formal opening of the inquest, which is to take place at three o'clock this afternoon. Mr Buchanan, the Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, had left Helmingham Tuesday night to reach Cambridge on Wednesday morning. He has sustained very serious injuries, and is now at the Lambert Memorial Hospital, Thirsk. The guard and the driver of the express, Mr Ewart of Gateshead, is also under treatment for a crushed right leg, and he is said to be in a little the worse for cuts from broken glass and severe bruises on the body. These two men are thought to consider precaution, Mr Buchanan in particular being in a critical condition. It is fully expected that Mr McCulloch will recover. Some of the passengers proceeded to York, others to their destinations, and others went on to Thirsk to be witnesses of the accident, namely, Mr Buchanan, Mr McCulloch, Mr Ewart, and Mr Mackenzie, who had removed to a cottage near to the Manor House Farm.

The fireman of the express, whose name was not to be obtained at Thirsk, like the engine-driver, was thrown from his position on the field on the Manor House Farm. When picked up, suffering from bruises and shock to the system, he was taken to the Northallerton Cottage Hospital. The guards of the train were unhurt. The express left Leeds for York, and the other went on to London as usual. The engine of the express, which was in the front of the express at the time of the accident, having taken his place in the middle van, the other official was at the rear of the train.

A DREAM THAT PRECEDED DEATH

A strange tree story is that of Mr Mackenzie, a passenger by the express. Mr Mackenzie, who was in company with his wife, travelling to London, where he proposed commencing work as a tailor. Mr Mackenzie states that he was asleep, leaving Darlington his wife handed over to her husband, and he, Mr Mackenzie, to take care of. He then went to sleep and fell asleep—he dreamed—he was in a railway train, no doubt, take note of the incident—and he dreamt that something unpleasant was going to happen, and he was awakened by the shock, after which he was in a dreadful state, and was assisted by the door of the compartment gave way, and he found himself in the middle of the wreck, and he travelled had been thrown forward beside the engine, and he found when he dropped from the carriage that water from the tank of the engine was streaming all over him. Fancying that the tank had been thrown over a bridge, he came to the conclusion that, as though to save his life by flying, he ran for the ground, and called out scrambling out he was almost overcome with the sight of the wounded, the plaintive cries of women and children, the groans of the men, and the awful nature of the scene which then presented itself. He was pulled unconscious by the securing possession of a lantern, went to look for his wife, and he was then, he said, he called her name. She, alas! was dead, having received, and instantly, the injuries of death. When he found Mrs Mackenzie she was in an opposing attitude, with her arms stretched forward, and her head thrown back, after which he himself gave way to his keen emotion and the sorrow of the position. He fainted and was taken from the scene to a neighbouring house in an unconscious condition. It is understood that Mr Mackenzie had in his hand-bag a sum of money, about £18, and this was swiped up in the heat of the burning carriage.

PERSONAL NARRATIVES.

Among the passengers by the ill-fated train was Mr R. A. Hodgson, of 37 Upper George Street, Bryanston Square, London, W., who after the collision proceeded to York, where he arrived at Station Hotel. He is suffering from an injury to the back, and should be unable to do any work for an interview with a representative of the press, he said:—I had been to Glasgow on Monday on business, and was returning to town by the Scotch express from Aberdeen. I joined the train there at ten minutes to eleven, and I intended to go on to Edinburgh just before eleven o'clock, and reached Newcastle about some time before two in the morning. Everything seemed to be all right until Darlington, and we passed a long path, and I left the carriage "caving in" feet fashion. I instantly realised that we had collided with something, and I ran out of the compartment in which I was, "Sir, For God's sake, put your legs on the seat." We were thrown about a little in the compartment. The doors of the carriage being locked, I crawled through a window, and lifted out one of the ladies. I then assisted to lift out some of the passengers, and, accompanied by one, I climbed and placed them at the side of the line. I gave what assistance I could to the dead and the injured. I shall never forget the scene. It was a most shocking spectacle, and to add to the horror of the situation the cries of those who were the passengers who were not seriously injured "lost their heads." I assisted to extricate the passengers by after their dear ones. I took upon myself the responsibility of getting out the injured from the van near the engine, and though I don't wish to put myself forward, I may say that I did my duty. I was at it had not been for my exertions the greater part of the luggage would have been lost. Several of the passengers were in a state of fright, and I got out, which we completed before the breakdown gang came. I remember especially a young lady in Leeds mails and other mails which were being conveyed to the scene. I remember the passengers I slipped down and "ricked" my back. I was the middle of the train, and I had narrow escape. I could see that were killed and injured than there were. I consider I and others had a marvellous escape. Let me mention that there were little bruises, but no serious injuries. The engine-driver of the express, I could see, had been very badly injured, and was covered with blood and dirt, and was taken away to watch the flames and prevent the fire to the site of the line, and he said, "Never mind me, go and look after the poor passengers." I was in a brave thing to say, but he afterwards dragged him on a cushion to a safer place. The guard was injured, and I understand he had to give the signal to block the line in either direction. The sight was quite shocking again. I saw a woman who had been thrown by the collision under the wreck, and I extricated her from it, and I helped the husband out. He was injured, and came to us crying, "My poor wife is under there." It was impossible for us to do, as the flames and the fire were blazing furiously. I never want to go through such an experience again, and there I was from seven o'clock in the morning, after I had done all I could have lifted from each other and groaning again by some Thirsk group. Further down the line, on the little siding for farm stock, there was more wreckage, and in time, when daylight had permitted, I found that the engine with its tender, the luggage was disembedded, and was placed along the side of the line, where it was curious to note that there was some of the roof pieces from carriages, showing the glide of the gas illuminant inside. A most striking feature of the whole affair is that with all the appliances for the prevention of the collision sound of the lighter articles were quite uninjured. The Pullman car, manufactured by the Palace Car Company, contained material which did not appear at all strong as compared with the other carriages, had its compartments and drapery in it, it said, the worse moved, and the roof cut up into overhanging shreds. Yet with an intervention of providence, for it seemed had been nothing else, not one of its occupants escaped without serious injuries. The description of this car in some slight degree accounted for this, as the portion which suffered the most and the end nearest the engine, was devoted to the purpose of lavatory, thus affording a space before reaching the car proper, in which sits several passengers of position. A section of the train which was removed to Northallerton in the morning, and was, we believe, the only part recovered intact, consisted of two carriages. There was, too, a composite carriage taken back to Northallerton. The front end of the latter was burnt out, and the entire roof was charred, the windows clay being broken.

Shipping.

HIGH WATER AT
SHIELDS, SUNDERLAND & HARTLEPOOL

	SHIELDS.		SUND'LAND.		HTLPOOL.
	Morn.	Even.	Morn.	Even.	Morn.	Even.
	H.M.	H.M.	H.M.	H.M.	H.M.	H.M.
Thursday...	1 42	2 0	1 54	2 12	2 24	2 42
Friday ...	2 22	2 42	2 32	2 52	3 57	3 57
Saturday ...	3 4	3 24	3 14	3 34	3 39	4 20
Sunday ...	3 48	4 10	3 58	4 20	4 5	4 25
Monday ...	4 37	4 57	4 47	5 7	4 47	5 6
Tuesday ...	5 18	5 41	5 28	5 54	5 33	5 49
Wednesday	6 11	6 36	6 21	6 46	6 26	6 55

Tide rises at Newcastle Bridge 2 hours 20 minutes, Albemouth 40 minutes, Holy Island 35 minutes, and Berwick Bar 1 hour 5 minutes before the time of high water at Shields. Middlesbrough 54 minutes, Stockton 1 hour 30 minutes, and the Humber 2 hours 15 minutes after.

METEOROLOGICAL REPORT.
"SHIELDS DAILY NEWS" OFFICE,
TUESDAY, THE 11TH OF SEPTEMBER, 1892.

Barometer and thermometer readings taken from the Meteorological Department's Instrument at North Shields at 8 a.m.

Barometer 29.39
Thermometers:—
" Dry Bulb 43
" Wet Bulb 42
" Maximum past 24 hours 45
" Minimum past 24 hours 41
Wind S.S.W., rainfall 0 17, sky clear, sea smooth.

Cronborne arrived at New York from Delaware on 2nd.

Dunbar arrived at Swinemunde on 2nd.

Blythville arrived at Rotterdam on 1st.

Kirkwall left Sydney for Leith on 2nd.

Brix arrived at New Fulwater from Cardiff on 2nd.

Ellenbrook arrived at Genoa on 2nd.

Starlight left Newport for Torre Annunziata on 1st.

Scot left Plymouth for Newport, Mon., on 2nd.

Gertrude left Marianopie for Gibraltar on 2nd.

Dilwarra arrived at Cape Town on 2nd.

Louise H., Cardiff to Antwerp via Hull, passed St. Catherine's Point, 2nd.

Cyprus arrived at Lisbon on 1st.

Kirkhaven left Sydney for Leith on 2nd.

Hazelmere, Capt. Smiles, arrived at St. Nazaire from Newcastle on 2nd.

Reculver left Malta for Copenhagen on 1st.

Elian passed Constantinople for Batoum on 1st.

Ingleborough left Port Talbot for Genoa on 2nd.

Starlights left Newport for Torre Annunziata on 1st.

Scot left Plymouth for Newport, Mon., on 2nd.

Gertrude left Marianopie for Gibraltar on 2nd.

Dilw