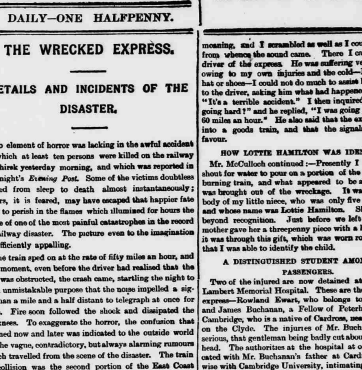
THE WRECKED EXPRESS.

DETAILS AND INCIDENTS OF THE DISASTER.

No element of horror was lacking in the awful accident by which at least ten persons were killed on the railway at Thirsk yesterday morning, and which was reported in last night's Evening Post. Some of the victims doubtless passed from sleep to death almost instantaneously; others, it is feared, may have escaped that happier fate only to perish in the flames which illumined for hours the scene of one of the most painful catastrophes in the record of railway disaster. The picture even to the imagination is sufficiently appalling.

The train sped on at the rate of fifty miles an hour, and in a moment, even before the driver had realised that the line was obstructed, the crash came, startling the night to such unmistakable purpose that the hope impelled a signalman a mile and a half distant to telegraph at once for help. Fire soon followed the shock and dissipated the darkness. To exaggerate the horror, the confusion that reigned now and later was indicated to the outside world by the vague, contradictory, but always alarming rumours which travelled from the scene of the disaster. The train in collision was the second portion of the East Coast express from Edinburgh to York and London.



FRONT AND SIDE VIEW OF THE PULLMAN CAR.

The following are a few of the most striking incidents associated with this dreadful disaster. Further and later details will be found elsewhere.

CHARRED REMAINS.

The scene of the collision was visited by some hundreds of spectators, who drove out in traps from Northallerton and other places to witness the ghastly spectacle. The clearing gang diligently pursued their work of trying to get the fire under, and rescuing the bodies. One of those recovered was in such a charred condition that it had to be gathered into a sack and removed to Thirsk. In one particular place there was sad and shocking evidence of the spot in which lay the remains of at least one of the missing bodies, for on a piece of burning debris were visible human remains, and the olfactory nerves conveyed sickening proof of the fact that portions were being consumed by the fire.
